Subject: Assessment of Drinking Water Quality of Different Municipal Supply Water of North 24 Parganas, West Bengal, India: A Comparative Study

Abstract

Clean and safe water is essential and significant for our daily life. With the unprecedented increase in population and the development of industrialization, the quality of municipal supplied water is being gradually endangered. Municipal supplied water plays a major role in drinking purposes in many urban areas of West Bengal, India. In this present study, the quality of the municipal drinking water samples of fourteen municipal areas within the North 24 Parganas district of West Bengal have been assessed. We have measured pH, TDS (Total Dissolved Solids), salinity, conductance, sodium ion concentration, potassium ion concentration, and pesticide residue concentration. Investigated water samples showed moderate salinity values and low to high ranges of conductance values. We have also encountered high sodium ion content in three municipality supply waters, whereas we got moderately low concentrations of potassium ion in these drinking water samples. Several water samples showed relatively high pH, another showed a very high TDS value, while eight municipal supply waters showed moderate TDS values. During the study of seventeen pesticide residues in these municipal drinking water samples, no sample water contained pesticide concentration higher than the BIS (Bureau of Indian Standards) limit.
